Read the passage and answer the question.

The Second Life of Glass

For years, Clearview County sent most broken glass from recycling bins to a landfill. The problem was not that glass could not be recycled. It was that jars and bottles often broke during collection, mixed with food scraps and paper, and became too contaminated for traditional glass manufacturers to use. Hauling the broken material to a distant processing plant also cost more than the county could afford.

Last year, the public works department tested a different approach. Instead of trying to turn broken glass back into bottles, workers crushed cleaned glass into a sand-like material called glass aggregate. The county then used the aggregate in a drainage layer under a new walking path at Riverside Park. Engineers tested the material to make sure sharp edges were removed and water could pass through properly.

The pilot project did not solve every recycling problem. Residents still needed to rinse containers, and glass mixed with trash could not be used. The county also had to buy equipment to clean and crush the material. However, the project reduced landfill waste and replaced some purchased gravel.

Public works director Maribel Stone said the project changed how her department viewed glass. “We stopped asking whether every bottle could become another bottle,” she explained. “We started asking whether the material could still serve a useful purpose.” If the next two projects perform well, the county may use glass aggregate under sidewalks, parking areas, and drainage trenches.

What is the main idea of the passage?

- A) Clearview County found a practical way to reuse some broken glass even when it could not be recycled into new bottles.
- B) Clearview County stopped accepting glass from residents because recycling is impossible.
- C) Riverside Park was closed because glass aggregate made the walking path unsafe.
- D) Traditional glass manufacturers asked the county to stop cleaning bottles and jars.

Meal Break Coverage Procedure

To: Front Desk and Fitness Floor Staff

From: Lakeside Recreation Center Management

Subject: Meal Break Coverage Procedure

Beginning Monday, all staff members must record meal break coverage on the shared schedule before leaving their assigned area. This procedure applies to the front desk, fitness floor, child activity room, and pool entrance.

Before a meal break begins, the employee leaving the area must confirm that another trained staff member is present and has accepted coverage. Coverage may not be provided by an employee who has not completed the required training for that area. For example, a fitness floor employee may not cover the pool entrance unless that employee has completed pool check-in procedures and emergency communication training.

The employee taking the break should write the start time, expected return time, and covering employee's initials on the shared schedule. If the covering employee is called away for an emergency, the manager on duty must be notified immediately.

This procedure is not meant to shorten breaks. It is meant to prevent unattended service areas and reduce confusion when members need help. Staff who have questions about coverage eligibility should speak with a shift lead before their scheduled break time.

What is the main purpose of the document?

- A) To explain how staff should arrange and record coverage before meal breaks
- B) To cancel meal breaks for front desk and fitness floor employees
- C) To allow any employee to cover any work area without training
- D) To announce that the recreation center will close during lunch hours

Why Neighborhood Tool Training Matters

The city should fund short tool-safety workshops at community centers. Many residents want to complete simple home projects, such as hanging shelves, repairing a loose step, or installing weather stripping, but they may not know how to use basic tools safely. A free ninety-minute workshop can prevent injuries and make small repairs less intimidating.

The need is practical. Staff at the North Park Community Center surveyed adults who attended a housing fair and found that many owned a drill or saw but had never received instruction on safe use. Several said they delayed minor repairs because they were afraid of damaging a wall or hurting themselves. When small problems are delayed, they can become larger and more expensive.

Tool-safety workshops could also support renters. A workshop should not encourage renters to make repairs that violate a lease. Instead, it can teach residents how to identify simple tasks they may handle, when to ask a landlord, and how to describe a problem clearly when requesting maintenance.

Some people argue that tool use is a private matter and not a city responsibility. However, community centers already teach practical skills such as computer use, first aid, and financial basics. Safe tool use fits the same purpose: helping residents manage ordinary problems with more confidence. The city does not need a large program. A few workshops each season would be a reasonable start.

What is the author’s main claim?

- A) The city should fund short tool-safety workshops because they can prevent injuries and help residents handle simple problems.
- B) The city should require every resident to buy power tools.
- C) Renters should repair all building problems without contacting landlords.
- D) Community centers should stop offering practical classes.

The Last Chair

When the auditorium emptied after graduation, Mr. Alvarez stayed behind to stack chairs. He had been the school custodian for twenty-two years, long enough to recognize families by the way they searched for seats. Tonight he had watched parents cheer, younger siblings wave programs, and graduates cross the stage with careful steps, as if each footfall carried more than a diploma.

He was almost finished when he noticed one chair still facing the stage. A blue program lay on the seat. On the back page, someone had written, "For Mom, who worked nights so I could finish." Mr. Alvarez picked it up gently.

He could have placed it in the trash with the empty water bottles and curled ribbons. Instead, he walked to the office and set it on the counter where graduates returned for records and transcripts. He added a note: "Found after ceremony."

The next morning, a young woman came in before the office officially opened. She wore jeans instead of a cap and gown, but Mr. Alvarez remembered her. She had paused at the top of the stage steps the night before, looking into the crowd before taking her diploma.

"My program," she said when she saw it. "I thought I lost it."

Mr. Alvarez nodded. "Important things have a way of waiting."

After she left, he returned to the auditorium. The chairs were stacked, the stage was bare, and the room looked ordinary again. But for a moment, he could still hear the applause.

What is the main conflict in the excerpt?

- A) Mr. Alvarez must decide what to do with a program that has personal meaning.
- B) Mr. Alvarez argues with graduates about where to sit.
- C) A graduate refuses to return to the school office.
- D) The auditorium cannot be cleaned after graduation.

How Public Comments Work

City councils often invite public comments before voting on local issues. A public comment period gives residents a chance to share concerns, support, questions, or personal experiences related to a decision. These comments can help elected officials understand how a proposal may affect people in different parts of the community.

Public comments are usually limited by time. A speaker may have two or three minutes, depending on the meeting rules. This limit can feel strict, but it allows more people to participate. Residents who want to speak effectively should prepare one main point, give a specific example, and end with a clear request. Reading a long history of the issue is usually less useful than explaining how the proposal affects the speaker or the community.

Written comments can also be important. Some residents cannot attend evening meetings because of work, childcare, transportation, or health concerns. Many councils accept emails or online forms before the meeting. Written comments may be included in the meeting record and reviewed by officials before a vote.

Public comments do not guarantee that officials will agree with every speaker. They are one part of the decision-making process, along with laws, budgets, staff reports, and competing community needs. Still, comments can shape the discussion by adding information that may not appear in official reports.

What is the main idea of the passage?

- A) Public comments give residents a way to share views with officials, but they are only one part of local decision-making.
- B) Public comments guarantee that city councils will approve every resident’s request.
- C) Residents should avoid preparing before speaking at public meetings.
- D) Written comments are never reviewed by elected officials.

Passage A: Keep Printed Bus Schedules

The transit agency should continue providing printed bus schedules at major stops, libraries, and senior centers. Digital schedules are useful, but not every rider has reliable phone service, a charged battery, or comfort using apps. A printed schedule can be read quickly without an account, data plan, or device.

Printed schedules are especially important when routes change. Riders may need to compare the new timetable with the old one, plan transfers, or share information with someone who does not use a smartphone. A paper schedule posted at a bus stop can also help occasional riders who are unfamiliar with the route.

The agency can reduce waste without eliminating printed schedules. It can print fewer copies, update them only when routes change, and use clear signs directing riders to online updates when possible. Public transportation works best when information is available in more than one format. Removing paper completely would make the system harder for some riders to use.

Passage B: Move Bus Information Mostly Online

The transit agency should move most bus schedule information online. Printed schedules become outdated quickly, especially when construction, weather, or staffing shortages require temporary changes. Riders who depend on paper may miss important updates. Online schedules can be revised immediately and can show real-time arrival information that paper cannot provide.

Printing and distributing schedules also costs money that could be used for service improvements. Many riders already check arrival times on phones before leaving home or work. The agency should invest in a simple, mobile-friendly website and electronic signs at the busiest stops.

Accessibility still matters. The agency should provide printed route summaries for riders who request them and post customer-service phone numbers at stops. However, maintaining large stacks of printed schedules at many locations is no longer the best use of resources. A mostly online system, supported by targeted paper options, would give riders more current information.

What is the central difference between the two passages?

- A) Passage A supports keeping printed schedules widely available, while Passage B supports moving most schedule information online with limited paper support.
- B) Passage A argues that buses should stop running, while Passage B argues that all stops should be removed.
- C) Passage A supports only smartphone apps, while Passage B opposes all electronic signs.

Type: essay

Category: Extended Response

Prompt:

Read both passages. Write an evidence-based essay of 300–500 words explaining which position is better supported. Use evidence from both passages. Maintain a formal tone and organize your response clearly.

Passage A:

Require Basic First Aid Training for High School Students

High schools should require students to complete basic first aid training before graduation. Students often witness injuries at school, work, sports events, and home. Knowing how to respond to bleeding, choking, burns, fainting, and sudden illness can make the minutes before professional help arrives safer and less confusing.

A basic course does not need to turn students into medical experts. It can teach them how to call emergency services clearly, recognize when a situation is dangerous, apply pressure to a wound, and avoid moving someone who may have a serious injury. These are practical skills that many adults wish they had learned earlier. Schools already teach health topics such as nutrition and substance abuse prevention, so first aid would fit naturally into existing health education.

The requirement could also build confidence. In an emergency, people sometimes freeze because they are afraid of doing the wrong thing. Training with simple scenarios can help students remember steps and understand their limits. A one-day or short-unit course would be a reasonable investment in student safety and community preparedness.

Passage B:

Do Not Make First Aid a Graduation Requirement

First aid is valuable, but high schools should not add it as a graduation requirement. Students already face crowded schedules, required testing, career programs, and credit requirements. Adding another required unit may sound simple, but schools must find trained instructors, purchase materials, schedule make-up sessions, and track completion. These costs and responsibilities can be difficult, especially for small districts.

A requirement may also create a false sense of readiness. A student who completes a short course may forget the steps months later or may misunderstand what to do in a serious emergency. Poorly remembered training can be risky. Schools should encourage first aid education, but they should not treat a brief course as proof that every graduate is prepared to respond safely.

There are better options. Schools can offer first aid workshops after school, partner with local emergency medical workers, and provide optional certification opportunities for students who want deeper training. Health classes can include emergency awareness without turning first aid into a graduation requirement. Encouragement and access are better than another rule students must satisfy.
